application. Every application, no matter how large or small, needs some form of security and encryption. Any user data you have is extremely valuable to potential hackers and should be protected. Basic encryption should be used when your application stores a password or some other form of identifying information.

Different levels of sensitive data require different encryption algorithms. Knowing which level to use can be determined by answering the basic question, "Will I ever need access to the original data after it has been encrypted?" When storing a user's password, using a heavily salted MD5 hash and storing that in the database is sufficient; then, you would use the same MD5 hashing on the input and compare the result from the database. When storing other sensitive data that will need to be returned to its original input, you would not be able to use a one-way hashing algorithm such as MD5; you would need a two-way encryption scheme to ensure that the original data can be returned after it's been encrypted.

Encryption is only as powerful as the key used to protect it. Imagine that an attacker breaches your firewall and has an exact clone of your database; without the key, breaking the encryption that protects the sensitive data would be nearly impossible. Keeping the key in a safe place should always be priority number one. Many people use an ini file that's read at runtime and that is not publicly accessible within the scope of the Web server. If your application requires two-way encryption, there are industry standards for protecting such data, one being AES encryption.
